SECRETU.S.-SOVIET CIVIL DEFENSE WORKING GROUPI. INTRODUCTION

During the March 1977 Moscow discussions between Secretary Vance and the Soviet leadership, the U.S. raised several issues related to SALT, one of which was the possible strategic impact of civil defense programs on the two sides. There was no substantive discussion of this issue; however, the Soviets did agree to consider the establishment of a working group that would engage in a dialogue on civil defense. The Soviets are now waiting for the U.S. to propose an agenda for that working group.

While the U.S. motivation in raising this issue was a concern about the potential impact of an unconstrained buildup in the Soviet civil defense program on the perception of the strategic balance, U.S. objectives in a U.S.-Soviet civil defense dialogue are as yet undefined. In light of this situation, this paper is designed to provide the necessary background information and analysis to facilitate a decision on: (a) the initial U.S. objectives in such a dialogue, and (b) the U.S. position, agenda, and timing for the initial discussions.

II. PURPOSE AND EXTENT OF CIVIL DEFENSE PROGRAMSA. Differences in Definitions

Discussions with the USSR for negotiating limits on civil defense efforts should, of necessity, first address the definitional differences associated with these efforts. The concept of civil defense includes continuity of government (protection of leadership), continuity of operations of important economic facilities through hardening and relocation, protection of the population, and planning for reconstitution and recovery following nuclear attack. In the USSR, such activities are termed "civil defense," while the comparable program in the U.S. is termed "civil emergency preparedness." It is also important to note that civil defense capabilities have relevance for natural disaster preparedness, and that there is a public recognition of this aspect of the programs.
